Museum attendance report

Introduction.

This report is aimed at describing the attendance rate of national museums and galleries in England for three separate years: 2013, 2015 and 2017. Some recommendations to the museum boards of directors are also included.

General tendencies.

We have to announce that there is a substantial increase in visits to those museums that have not introduced any admission charges. The situation is different for other museums, but the number of visits to them increases gradually.

Analysis.

As we have already mentioned, the introduction of admission charges in the Natural History Museum and the Science Museum in 2014 changed the statistics dramatically. Comparing 2013 and 2015, their visits decreased from 3.7 mln to 1.6 mln and from 3.8 mln to 1.3 mln respectively. However, there was a slight increase in 2017 by 0.3 mln for both of the museums, which means that people gradually get used to changes of museums' policy. We also can see that with the introduction of charges museums with free admission started appealing visitors even more. Since 2013 the visits of the British Museum, the National Gallery and the Tate Gallery have doubled, and they keep rising. We can also draw it on the increase of interest in culture and science, but it cannot be the only reason as the attendance rise is so significant.

Recommendations.

According to the data, we recommend the museum boards of directors to lower admission charges (if there are any) in order to widen the range of possible visitors. What would also help is ^{the} discount programme for students, aimed at attracting them.

All in all, we can ^{notice} ~~mention~~ a good tendency in museum attendance.
Visits now rise gradually from year to year, despite the changes in 2014.
