Visits to national museums and galleries in England
Introduction
This report is to give information on the tendencies regarding the rates of attendance of various cultural establishments, to draw on this knowledge, give recommendations on how to increase the number of visitors and to make a conclusion.

Summary
It is clear that some museums are becoming more popular among the public, yet others have experienced a substantial drop in appeal. However we can also observe that the Natural History Museum and the Science Museum are regaining their former strength going from 1,6 million to 1,9 million and from 1,5 million to 1,6 million visitors respectively.

Analysis
I believe the first trend is due to a number of museums introducing admission fees, because, for example, the Natural Gallery's visits have increased, which can not be said about the establishments that have [redacted] enforced payments. Another factor might be that people are less invested in the natural sciences, we can see this by paying attention to the fact that the Natural History Museum and the Science

Museum are visited less than the British Museum, the National Gallery or the Tate Gallery.

Recommendations

I would recommend to the directors to lower admission charges and start a marketing campaign to make the public interested once again.

Conclusion

It would be a great loss to humanity's culture if even a small percentage of our museums closed their doors to the visitors, thus we need to change some of the policies that endanger our future.
